two-mile-long stretch of wide sandy beach beckons visitors to busy San Buenaventura State Beach in the heart of the city of Ventura in Southern California. Surfers ride the waves while families picnic, groups play volleyball, and anglers drop their lines from the iconic Ventura Pier, known for its great fishing.

This celebrated recreation venue also offers swimming and cycling. Beachgoers enjoy strolling down the 1,700-foot wooden pier with its snack bar, restaurant, and bait shop. Beach visitors can gaze east to the mountains or look west across the channel to admire spectacular crimson sunsets.

The beach overlooks the Channel Islands, a necklace of five islands 14 miles off the coast. The Channel Islands are home to more than 2,000 plant and animal species.

PARK HISTORY

Native Americans

Chumash people have lived along this coast and on the Channel Islands for at least 13,000 years. Occupation of a beachside village called Shisholop, meaning “port” in the Ventureño Chumash language, dates from the past 1,000 years. Indeed, this village along the northern border of the state beach was the western terminus of an important trade route between the coast and the interior southern San Joaquin Valley. Unfortunately, much of the Shisholop site was destroyed by erosion and development.

Its proximity to the Northern Channel

Islands made the coast near today's Ventura an important cross-channel launch point for the native people's plank canoes, called tomol. The Chumash—a name derived from the inhabitants of Santa Cruz Island (Michumash)—were well known for their production of shell beads. They paddled their tomol along the coast and islands, trading fish, shell bead money, and other goods with coastal villagers and Channel Islands communities. Modern Chumash descendants recreate the crossing in a traditional tomol from Ventura Harbor to Santa Cruz Island annually.

Portuguese explorer Juan Rodriguez Cabrillo first encountered the Chumash living in thatched houses, called ‘ap, at the edge of the Pacific Ocean in 1542. Other early visitors included Gaspar de Portolá in 1769 and Juan Bautista de Anza in 1776. In 1782 Father Junípero Serra founded Mission San Buenaventura, which was built with Chumash labor.

Today, a small museum at the mission displays Chumash artifacts.

NATURAL RESOURCES

Geology

The state beach includes coastal sand dunes, which form when on-shore winds blow sand along the beach. The sand then piles up around something that slows the wind, such as plants or driftwood. Dune formation can provide natural resiliency to rising sea levels and storm surges attributed to global climate change.

Flora and Fauna

Sand dunes support an array of plants and animals. Native plants, such as red and pink sand verbena, grow sparsely on the dunes, along with beach evening primrose, Coast buckwheat, and silver beach burr.

Beachgoers may spot sunning sea lions or whimbrels wading on the beach, along with killdeer, willets, and silvery legless lizards.

The nesting of the threatened western snowy plover—a sparrow-sized, well-camouflaged shorebird—is monitored at the beach. Heed warning signs erected near nest sites during the breeding season, which lasts from early spring to mid-fall.

RECREATION

Swimming and surfing are popular pastimes. Seasoned surfers enjoy the wave action at Surfer's Point and farther out on a reef known as "Outsides," which is famous for its monster waves.

Fishing—Ventura Pier has been a favored spot for local anglers since its inception.

At the ideal place to catch Pacific thresher shark, fishing enthusiasts also hook yellowtail, Pacific mackerel, white sea bass, halibut, corbina, or turbot. A sand playground next to the pier keeps kids happy while their parents fish or sunbathe.

Picnicking—San Buenaventura features the largest day-use picnic area at a state beach in Southern California. Set back behind the dunes are picnic tables, barbecues, restrooms, and an equipment rental shop.

One of the most popular picnicking opportunities is found at the Jolly Oyster in the day-use area. Families and oyster lovers from far and wide shuck raw, local, farm-fresh oysters and clams by the dozens.

Bicycling—For those who like to cycle with a water view, a paved hike and bike path runs from the park entrance past the Ventura Pier, along the Ventura River, and back along the beach to north Emma Wood State Beach. At the pier, a variety of bicycles can be rented to cycle along the beach and boardwalk, from mountain bikes to modern carriages—called surreys—complete with fringe on top.

Volleyball—Courts near the picnic area are popular for pick-up matches, youth camps, tournaments, and league play.

SPECIAL EVENTS

The beach is the site for a number of special events throughout the year, including triathlons, festivals, volleyball tournaments, and cycling events. For an event schedule, visit www.parks.ca.gov/sanbuenaventura.

Those looking for a memorable wedding or event locale with beautiful ocean views should contact the special events coordinator at (805) 648-4059 or email ventura@parks.ca.gov.

ACCESSIBLE FEATURES

Parking, restrooms, the picnic area, and the pier are accessible. Call (805) 648-3321 for information on reserving a beach wheelchair.

Accessibility is continually improving. For updates, visit <http://access.parks.ca.gov>.
